That reminds me of something that occurred to me a while ago: There seems to be an attitude of: "I suffered long and hard to figure out how to use it, you should have to as well."

I don't mind giving people a fair bit of help, but I do get annoyed that if you tell someone to modify something in the "security level" control panel (for instance), that they want you to explicitly tell them where to find it in the menu, as well. How hard is it to look through your menus and see what options you have?

Though, to be fair, that's far more of a Windows than Linux issue.

Don't send private replies to my address, the mailbox is ignored.
I read messages from the public lists.
