I would say to you to forget Fedora. I found it to be almost the same as RHEL, but too different to be useful. Get CentOS if you can't get RHEL. But, I think they are still letting people have 30 day evaluation copies of RHEL. I found this to be very useful indeed. You need to read the course synopsis on the RH website and take the self evaluation tests that are also available from RH.

Above all, practice, practice and practice some more. The more you are familiar with RHEL, the better you will do. If you do the training, then be prepared for a very intensive week!

I got lucky on some of the questions I had in the test and amazed myself by passing both sections of the test with 100%. Read the course notes thoroughly, practice on your own system at home and ask lots of questions! The only silly question is the one that isn't asked.

Good luck with the course. When it gets to the test, don't panic. Read the test paper thoroughly and completely before even filling in your name. Don't assume that the people who are leaving the test after 15 minutes have finished the test already, they have probably given up!

Hope it goes well. When are you hoping to do the course? I'd advise you to wait until RH5 comes out. That way, the qualification will last until RH7 is released.

Once again, good luck.

Andy

P.S. I was told that 80% of first time candidates fail the test and the overall pass rate is only 50%, so it is difficult. But if I can do it, then so can you. ;-)

RE: RHCT Studying

I concur with John. I did the training bundled with the test and found the training to be excellent. Lots of money, though. Fortunately it was paid for by my employer.

I would also suggest some training from Red Hat. Expensive if you are funding yourself but from the course I did I can say it was excellent.

I am currently studying for my RHCT, I'm not ambitious enough to go for the RHCE right away. But I was wondering if anyone could recommend any tools of study or any thing that would be helpful in studying for this test.
