Yes, leaving packages installed that you don't want to have, and then complaining when the system repairs what you broke, that's much simpler than just uninstalling what you don't want to have (or, perhaps, just not installing them in the first place – you did do it manually)

Oh, it's not a case of "I don't want it". It's a case of "I don't want it to kill my machine" thing. There's a difference. Obviously, I want to be able to locate files, emails and stuff like that. And I can remove it all, renice it and stuff ... it's not a question of what I want here. It's a question of a system, that is trying to make it into the desktop world. And I'm just pointing out a fact ... and when I say it's redundant, I don't mean it's unwanted ... I mean it's low priority.
